STORYLINE

Sport has the power to change the world, to unite people.
Sport can create hope, where once there was only despair.
It is more powerful than governments in breaking down racial barriers.
Sport laughs in the face of all types of discrimination.

NELSON MANDELA

The NGO “Sports Around the World”’s program covers several african countries: Cameroon, Swaziland, Tanzania and Rwanda. Since the this NGO was founded they’ve built multiple basketball courts and launched a number of sports programs in villages in Cameroon, Tanzania, Swaziland and now in Rwanda.

“Working together, everyone ends up growing. If we help each other, just like with a game of soccer, we achieve our aim: we score”.

The project is focused on using sports to help the young people: they can drive away their negative thoughts. In their villages they had forgotten about sports, because they didn’t have the means or the possibility to play. The mothers and fathers of any of the children in Rwanda are linked to the genocide in some way: there are parents who took an active part, and those who were imprisoned.

All of these kids experienced the intense consequences of that massacre. This experimenting with sports is an effective way of overcoming everything they have experienced and continue to experience within their families.

“Sports are the way toward brotherhood and a brighter future for this devastated nation”.

DIRECTORS' COMMENTARY

I remember myself at 8 years old, with eyeglasses, my shoes perpetually untied and a red notebook clutched in my hand. Even when it was nice outside I always preferred to sit inside, in front of that newfangled device called VCR. Watching movies. Immobilized by emotion. Studying characters, frames, colors, movements and music. Daydreaming my days away. Imagining all the different ways that Cinema can tell a story. One, ten, one hundred...a thousand stories altogether. It was in those days, so long ago, that I decided I wanted to be a director, to make people dream just as I had dreamed as I watched those flickering images. I'm happy with what I've been able to accomplish so far; me, that little boy who used to steal his daddy's VHS tapes so he could watch and re-watch them on the sly, again and again for days in a row. Some films have irrevocably changed my life and I will never be done thanking all the artists who helped me see the esthetic, ideological, historical and – above all humane – value a film can have. I don't want to be cheap on my dreams. That's why I hold on to my passion for story telling with the same innocence I had when I was a child, the child with the red pencil-book.

For this work, we had a goal to score: promote all the activities of Sports Around The World NGO. We'd like people to watch this, to encourage potential sponsorships or to invite everybody to do the same in those devastated territories. Nobody will make money with this movie, and we just don't care. As we like to say, it was made "for a better world"! We worked almost for free with a very, very little budget. We deeply wanted to tell this story, and it was not a matter of money. And, for real, we're very happy and we look forward to get back to Rwanda as soon as possible, to shoot another movie: those guys really deserve a big attention for everything they have been doing in Africa.
